For a long time, the killing of unarmed Black people has sparked calls for reform. The death of George Floyd by a white police officer has laid bare an open wound in our nation and inflicted additional trauma on people of color plagued by a history of institutionalized police violence and systemic racism. The protests erupting across the country demonstrate the urgency in which these issues still need to be addressed.

Please join the Connecticut Racial Profiling Prohibition Project and our many partners in an open and honest discussion about policing and race relations in our state. We will discuss how we reconcile with our past and explore ways to heal our communities.
